A short interconnection or one that operates at a low frequency behaves as a group of lumped circuit elements, such as one capacitor and several resistors (a). If the interconnection is long or the signal frequency is high, the interconnection behaves as a transmission line, which has decidedly different characteristics (b).